The potential of a cationic polymer, chitosan, as an immunoadjuvant in the delivery of monoclonal antibodies (MABs) to immune sites was examined. As a model system, we used a monospecific MAB specific for an acidic epitope on thyroglobulin (hTg [11]) that inhibits the binding of [125I]Tg to rat thyroid. This MAB was grafted onto a previously synthesized chitosan polymer [Yamamoto et al. (1990) Bioconjugate Chem. 1, 212-219]. In vitro cytotoxicity assays indicated that the immunoadjuvant effects of chitosan were preserved after MAB grafting. Thyroglobulin-directed hTg antibody was transferred to rat tissues in vitro by the use of a recently developed aqueous gelling device [Uchi et al. (1991) Biomaterials, 2, 69-76]. The results showed that the MAB was transferred to tissue surfaces in a dose-dependent manner. This study suggests that chitosan may be useful in the delivery of monospecific antibodies to tissues by a ligand-directed tissue adhesion mechanism that is based on an antibody transfer approach.Q: How to bring cursor to the bottom of the textbox after pressing enter key on a browser Once I press enter key, the focus is not moved to the end of the text box.
